PLAYWRIGHT'S NOTE

Back in 2009 while I was writing Room (the novel), I had a feeling that it could probably work on stage too.

The premise is so inherently theatrical - in fact, Jack and Ma's situation sounds like a metaphor for theatre: two people in a room with limited space and resources, conjuring up a world of play, intimacy, and imagination.

Funnily enough, the startling success of Lenny Abrahamson's Irish-Canadian film of Room (nominated for multiple Oscars, Golden Globes, and Baftas) helped me write the stage version, when the time came. I felt freed from the need to be naturalistic in every detail about the kidnap situation or the aftermath of escape, because the film had pushed the story as far towards naturalism as it could go. For the theatre production, by contrast, my director/collaborator Cora Bissett and I went back to what readers had responded to so strongly — Jack's buoyant, world-creating voice—and also let ourselves use more overtly theatrical devices such as puppetry and projection. From the first email she sent me, out of the blue, Cora knew that the show needed music, primarily as a release valve for Ma's secrets, for everything messy and irrational that she can't tell her little boy. The urgent songs by Cora and Kathryn Joseph have turned out to be my favourite part of the stage production.

Another great pleasure that came out of our development process was the interplay between Jack and SuperJack (the child's inner voice or alter ego, played by an adult). Adding SuperJack was a pragmatic device to avoid making our very young actors deliver long monologues, but it also turned out to be a rich way of showing what superpowered, ever-questioning minds can inhabit little bodies.

This production at the Grand Theatre and Mirvish's Princess of Wales Theatre — all thanks to the unstoppable Dennis Garnhum for making it happen — is not only the North American premiere but, for me, a wonderful closing of the circle. I got the idea for the story of Room while driving from London to Burlington on Ontario's Highway 401. Though the novel and film are set in a non-specified American city — American rather than Canadian, so they wouldn't have free healthcare — I always saw this as a sort of fable which could play out anywhere. I researched it at home in London's Wortley Village where I've lived since 1998, and details of local parks and libraries and malls show up in the book's second half. I wrote one big scene in the lobby of the Central YMCA on Waterloo Street, having left our kids in the childcare room on the pretense that I was going for a swim. (What can I say — every mother needs a break!)

The first stage production of Room began in the other London (UK) before touring to Scotland and Ireland, so I wrote that script in British English, but for this production, with the help of the actors and creative team, I made the idiom more Canadian. I couldn't be happier that this universal story, which began right here, has made its way home, and (with the help of such brilliant collaborators) touched so many people along the way.

The show was cancelled by Covid-19 before the Grand's opening night on 13 March, 2020. In the past two years, haven't we all come to know more than we ever wanted to learn about feeling stuck at home - confined by unpredictable forces beyond our control? Like Ma, most of us have had to learn to make the best of an endless string of monotonous days, and seize moments of pleasure and meaning wherever we could find them. The threat of a world of 'invisible germs' has become all too familiar, too; the joy of human connection, all the more precious. For me, the story of Room has never felt more relevant, and I'm proud to be part of a production that tells it so powerfully.

Emma Donoghue

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

When I first read Emma Donoghue's extra-ordinary novel Room I was on a flight, and I finished it in one go, unable to put it down for a second.

I felt breathless reading it, and finally shattered, elated, strung out, and joyous all at once—such is the power of her storytelling and the vividness of the characters she has created in Jack and Ma.

I was reading it simply for pleasure, and yet almost instantly I started seeing ways in which this could be dramatized on stage. I could see the little boy tucked inside a wardrobe, and imagined an entire set to allow us to view events from his perspective. I imagined how we could evoke this world of Room with beauty, love, and imagination, so much so that as an audience, just as a reader, we think Jack is living in a perfect home. It is only through carefully placed details that we peek between the layers of what is actually going on to begin with, and the torturous hell from which Ma is so heroically protecting him.

But strangely, I could also hear songs: aching songs of desperation and hope; songs of survival. This surprised me — anyone who has read the book will, I imagine, not see it as prime material for a music-based drama! But the instinct was so strong that I sat in my hotel room and bashed out some sketches.

I decided to write to Emma Donoghue's agent and attach these very rough demos. The planets aligned in my favour and Emma Donoghue connected with the vision of the show I saw. We met in London UK, and a partnership was forged. I then approached the wonderful singer-songwriter Kathryn Joseph — whose beguiling music I was a huge fan of — to see if she would write songs with me. She couldn't believe I'd asked. Room was her favourite novel of all time.

I am beyond delighted to finally be bringing Room to its rightful home at the Grand Theatre, London, and now to Toronto's Princess of Wales Theatre with an astonishing cast and creative team whom I feel honoured to work with. When we had to close this show on Opening Night on that fateful day two years ago, I never could have imagined what we were all going to collectively experience in every nation of the world. It is ironic that through experiencing lockdown, the isolation of the pandemic, the uncertainty in all of our lives, I feel the story resonates in a more prescient, and reachable way than ever before.

Room has become a story of Now. I am returning to view it through a whole new lens; it's a story of surviving through enormous uncertainty. Pushing our closest relationships to the max. Many of us have shared more time in the same space with our closest people than we ever have in all our lives, and for others, isolation has been a daily challenge to navigate. We are all trying to survive, to reinvent, and to hold onto hope. Ultimately, I think that this is what Room is about: holding onto the tiniest of hope in the darkest of places. It is about finding strength in love – even when you feel that you have nothing left to give.

It is my sincere hope that you too experience this light through Room and allow Ma to inspire you – even through your darkest days.

Her international bestseller Room won the Rogers Writers Trust and Commonwealth Prizes and was a finalist for the Man Booker and Orange; the screenplay of the 2015 film won her Oscar, Golden Globe and Bafta nominations. She adapted Room for the stage with songs by Cora Bissett and Kathryn Joseph. Donoghue co-wrote the forthcoming Netflix film The Wonder based on her Giller-nominated 2016 novel. CORA BISSETT

Director/Music & Lyrics

Cora Bissett is a Scottish Director, Actor and song-writer. She has been Associate Director at the National Theatre of Scotland since 2014 where her work includes Rites, Interference and the multi award-winning Adam, the remarkable real-life story of an Egyptian trans man who settled in Glasgow; which were all conceived and directed by Cora. Adam went on to be adapted for a BBC 4 TV film in 2021, which Cora co-directed and won a BAFTA award for best scripted Drama. She set up her own company PACHAMAMA in 2010 with a strong emphasis on stories exploring societal injustice and shining a light on unexplored corners of Scottish society. Many of her shows are inspired by real life events. The company's first production was Roadkill, co-created with writer Stef Smith, which was awarded the Edinburgh

International Festival 2010, then toured to London, Paris, New York and Chicago before winning a 2012 Olivier Award for Outstanding Production in London. She then went on to tackle the real-life story of The Glasgow Girls and turned it into a multi-authored grime/hip hop/folk/rock musical highlighting the heinous events known as Dawn Raids in Glasgow. Proving it possible to make the complexities of immigration a vital and accessible story, it went on to win the Amnesty Award for Freedom of Expression and the Off West End Award for Best New Musical. Cora's other passions lie in creating music-theatre hybrid shows which are not traditional musicals but explore ways in which live music and theatre can merge to create exciting 'gig' type cross-forms. Her production of Grit: The Martyn Bennett Story, based on Scotland's maverick musician won Outstanding Event of the Year at the Scottish Trad Awards, and Janis Joplin – Full Tilt played multiple sold-out runs at the Edinburgh Fringe before transferring to London, UK. Cora worked closely with Emma Donoghue as Director and Composer on this new music theatre adaptation of Emma's best-selling novel Room for Theatre Royal Stratford East London/Abbey Theatre, Dublin in 2017 and this incarnation in London, ON and Toronto, 2022. As a writer, Cora penned her first full length auto-biographical play What Girls Are Made Of in 2019. It charted her time as a teen singer in a Fife indie band who were signed to Major label Phonogram in the early 90s and explored the cult of the 'next big thing' and growing up in the music industry in that era. The show toured internationally from the U.S. to São Paulo to Melbourne. She is currently adapting it as a TV series with Black Camel Productions in Scotland and is working on Orphans, a

KATHRYN JOSEPH

Music & Lyrics

Intimate, fearlessly frank and with a fathoms-deep emotional resonance, Scottish singer-songwriter and musician Kathryn Joseph's highly individual expression was first heard on 2015's Bones You Have Thrown Me and Blood I've Spilled which bagged her the Scottish Album of the Year Award. Her follow up From When I Wake the Want Is, is of an equally devastating, understated intensity in terms of her heavily rhythmic piano work, striking vocals and vivid lyrics, but with a newly muscular edge and textured depth. Her new album For You Who Are the Wronged will be released worldwide on 22 April 2022 via Rock Action Records.
